Twelve Days of Arkansas Agriculture:  Bureau of Standards Protects Arkansas Buyers and Sellers

LITTLE ROCK, AR – The Bureau of Standards, a division of the Arkansas Agriculture Department’s State Plant Board, helps protect buyers and sellers throughout the state by inspecting all commercial weighing or measuring as well as ensuring compliance with other Arkansas consumer protection laws.

Thirteen field inspectors, with assigned regions across the state, inspect packages and conduct price verifications at retail and wholesale outlets to assure the accuracy of advertised commodities, test motor-fuel dispensers and small capacity commercial scales, and respond to consumer complaints. 7,334 Arkansas retail businesses were inspected during the previous fiscal year which included 580 catfish labeling inspections, 1,451 motor-fuel dispenser tests, inspection of 1,765 scales, and responding to 67 consumer complaints.

“Our staff works diligently to ensure a fair marketplace by guaranteeing that Arkansas consumers are paying for products as they are advertised, and that businesses are receiving fair profits for the products that they sell,” says Agriculture Specialist Roger Frazier. “During the holidays, we focus on high volume seasonal items like turkeys, sweet potatoes, cranberries, and bows and wrapping.”

Investigators follow guidelines established by the National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST) handbooks, which are published annually and create uniformity across the United States. States may also enact legislation to address state specific issues like the Arkansas Catfish Labeling Law. During a catfish labeling inspection, inspectors check billboards and restaurant menus to determine whether fish served at the establishment is labeled as “farm- raised” or “imported.” Then, inspectors work with managers to check invoices and verify that the label for the fish is actually the location of origin listed on the invoice. Finally, inspectors request to look at any excess fish in stock to check labeling of the excess product. Of the 580 catfish labeling inspections completed in fiscal year 2017, 94% were in compliance.
